Energy Procedia provides the energy research community with a fast and flexible route to the publication of research presented at leading scientific conferences spanning the field of energy science, technology and engineering. Conference proceedings are only accepted for publication in Energy Procedia after a full assessment from the editorial team. All papers must be original, and peer-review is mandatory.

The majority of research on the energy usage of these robot devices for pick & place tasks focuses on path planning. The study presented in this paper explores the energy savings in using low degree-of-freedom devices and the influence of design parameter selection. Energy predictor equations are developed and confirmed through experimentation.
